

I'm not robot!

- All are designed to use literature as a springboard for thinking, exploring ideas, making observations, and expressing personal feelings.
- Each set of writing prompts includes some that are less challenging (LC) and some that are more challenging (MC). Most of the writing prompts fall somewhere in the middle.
- Writing prompts are not identified by degree of difficulty in the Response Journal prompts. You will find a list of their designations in the Teacher's Key.
- Less challenging writing prompts are brief and easier to read. They feature one question for students to consider. If the prompts are text-based, they address a limited portion of the reading.
- More challenging writing prompts frequently engage critical thinking skills. For example, the more challenging prompts ask students to analyze, compare, contrast, interpret, predict, and infer. They often address literary elements, and they usually contain multiple parts. More challenging writing prompts may ask students to work with portions of the text that require close reading.

However you decide to use the Response Journal in your class, we hope both you and your students will find the writing prompts interesting and will enjoy making the Response Journal part of your class activities.
